Move over puny little weekend beer festivals, because a 10-day citywide celebration of brews is coming

Organized by Dine LBC, the new event is still in the early planning stages, but Terri Henry, the founder of the popular restaurant week event, hopes to get about 40 breweries and restaurants on board.

“As opposed to a weekend festival, this will give breweries and restaurants and pubs that take their beer seriously an opportunity to schedule events,” Henry said.

“Restaurant Week has been unbelievably successful and I just think it’s time (for a beer week),” she added.

And she’s probably right because like the rest of the region, Long Beach has been swept in the craft beer movement and seen various breweries open in recent years. Currently there are about dozen or so in the city and nearby area in addition to dozens of restaurants that have a strong focus on beer.

For Long Beach Beer Week, Henry envisions events such as tap takeovers, meet-and-greets with brewers, new beer releases, educational classes focused on beers, food pairings and maybe even beer yoga.

“I hear that’s a thing now,” she said.

There are no tickets needed to take part in Long Beach Beer Week because like Dine LBC and other restaurant weeks all people have to do is check on the Beer Week website for a list of participating places and the specials they will offer.

Unlike restaurant weeks however, which typically include prix fixe dinner and lunch menus at various price points that all restaurants agree to honor, there are no set event prices for Long Beach Beer Week. Instead, each brewery or restaurant will decide the cost for their own events.

“We’re going to encourage them to be creative,” Henry said.

But Henry is probably not going to have to worry about encouraging beer lovers to participate because besides the locals, thousands more will already be in the city at the not-so-puny California Craft Beer Summit and Beer Festival.

The event usually takes place in Sacramento but will be coming to the Long Beach Convention Center on September 12-14, 2019 and will feature pours from 170 breweries from across California.
